There is a 10-inch fish, probably a trout, in the fountain in City park which has led to much speculation as to how it got there. The fish has been there for some time and people who visit the park often have expected to miss it each day, only to find it still there each time they look. One son of Isaac Walton says he knows how it got there and claims that someone he will not name brought it back alive from a trip to a nearby pond and deposited it in the fountain. Others, however, affirm that the recent heavy rains may have been responsible.

That many people are either superstitious or extremely careful was brought to mind yesterday when painters were busy painting the front of the Jackson block on North Main street. They employed ladders for the work and these ladders, to reach the third story, had to be extremely long, so that when placed against the building their bases came well out to the edge of the sidewalk. The space between them and the wall was left free for traffic but out of some 40 people who were observed to pass but four of them ventured beneath the ladders. Only one of these was a man.
